

Person Perception

- Person perception is the process of forming impressions about others and understanding others.

Basic Rules

1. We form impressions quickly, based on minimal information.
2. Special attention to salient feature than attending everything.
3. We do consider the context of a behaviour while interpreting a behaviour or forming an impression.
4. We focus on categorizing. Rather than seeing each person as a separate individual, we tend to see people as members of groups. We tend to have existing cognitive structures for making sense of different groups.
5. Our own goals are important while we are perceiving

Self-presentation

- Deliberate efforts to act in ways that create a particular impression of the self
- Might be deliberate or automatic
- Self-promotion: conveying positive information about oneself to others (say good things like intellectual accomplishments only when you are asked)
(egoistic, less likeable)
- Ingratiation: Flattering/ doing favours for a person to get that person to like you.
(you are liked, but your competence might be questioned)

Modesty

‘I could not have done it without.....’

Modesty works better when you are successful at something

Modesty boosts one’s public image only when the audience knows the full extent of one’s success

Ineffective self-presentation

Don't drop big names and your association with them.

Discrepancy between what you say and how you behave.

Don't make excuses. External attributions for failures and internal attributions for success is considered to be a red flag.
